3: Czaplicka, M. A. The Turks of Central Asia in History and at the Present Day. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1918.

Pp. 242; 2 appendices; bibliography.

Yale: Bj59.6c.

[This ethnographic study propounds the thesis that a wide divergence in culture, language, and physical type exists among the Turkic peoples of Central Asia. The Iranian Turks and the Turanian Turks cannot be regarded as either a single racial or cultural entity. In addition to extensive acculturation, the infiltration of other ethnic groups--which can be proved by archaeological and anthropometric evidence--negates any Pan-Turkic theory. The author feels, therefore, that the Turanian movement had no scientific basis, but was instigated by political and economic motives. This book includes a thorough analysis of the clan divisions and customs prevalant among the Turkic peoples. An extensive bibliography appears at the end of the text. --Analyst]

Field date: none
Analyst: June Orloff

Evaluation: Ethnologist--4
Processed in 1955